

One of the sites is the unique natural Museum of Sikachi-Alyan.

The Sikachi-Alyan Petroglyphs is the property of the planet.

The Sikachi-Alyan Petroglyphs are known since the ancient times (the village of Sikachi-Alyan is the Nanai site of an ancient camp).

The first scientific description of the petroglyphs are made in 1859, by R. K. Maak.

Early petroglyphs belong to the Osipovsky culture, hollowed out with stone tools and date back to the XII-IX BC.

Archaeologists suggest that wild horses painted on the boulders, inhabited in the Amur region only in glacial period.

An image of a mammoth is found among the petroglyphs, perhaps the ancient people hunted them.

Late petroglyphs are dated from the III BC and carved with iron tools.

The petroglyphs are located in the flooded zone (at certain periods of the year not visible), during spring break can be damaged by ice floes.

Just about 300 scientific descriptions of individual rock art images are made. Today the number of the petroglyphs is smaller, about 200, some of them were lost — carried floating ice floes in the spring and is located on the river bottom.

It is assumed that some of the petroglyphs are not visible (boulder flipped image down).

The Museum under the open sky is opened at the place, where the petroglyphs were found. The ethnographic Museum, the branch of the Khabarovsk regional Museum by N.I. Grodekova, is located in the national Nanai village Sikachi-Alyan.

Exact copies and concrete casts of some of the most famous boulders with petroglyphs were made. Models with the petroglyphs of Sikachi-Alyan are part of the exposition of the Khabarovsk Museum of archaeology (a branch of the Khabarovsk regional Museum. N.I. Grodekova).

The place, where the Sikachi-Alyan Petroglyphs were found, is the area of religious worship (shamanism) and the national symbol of the Nanai people.

Scientists still have not uncovered all the mysteries of these unique archaeological finds.

You may unravel other secrets of these places during our trip.

The journey will be not only interesting, but also informative.
